During the middle and later Pleistocene geological epoch (c. 450,000 to 40,000 years ago) several new human species appeared on Earth for the first time. What were these early human populations like? Why did all but Homo sapiens eventually disappear toward the end of the Pleistocene Epoch? And how do the various Pleistocene human species live on in our own genes, biology, and behavior today? These are some of the questions this course explores as we investigate a range of evidence from this crucial time in human evolution.

$60.00
Available quantity: 20

This course provides an overview of the Hollywood Blacklist from different perspectives. We will look at first at the long history of government investigations into the politics of artists. The well-known post-war House Un-American Activities Committee and the McCarthy Hearings led to well-publicized blacklisting and even prison sentences. But the effects of the investigations went far deeper and many careers of "unnamed" artists were halted or ruined. The collateral damage changed the content of movies as well as the way Hollywood did business at home and internationally.

Powerful populist leaders that sought to consolidate power. Disconnects between the ruling political elite and the masses. Enormous wealth disparity. The erosion of constitutional norms and the justice system. Assassination and civil war. The rise of autocracy. This six-week course will examine all the factors that led to the fall of the Roman Republic and the Rise of Imperial Rome while drawing timely insights to modern politics in the United States. While there are clear structural and cultural differences between ancient Rome and modern America, patterns of political dysfunction, erosion of norms, and the consolidation of power pose cautionary lessons as we approach a critical national election.
